In the 1798 poem “Frost at Midnight”, Samuel Taylor Coleridge describes his own childhood as a negative experience and expresses his hope that his son Hartley will have a better one. The poem has strong Christian themes, particularly in its depiction of nature. “Frost at Midnight” is one of eight poems by Coleridge known as the conversation poems, and it is often considered the best of the eight.